

O. LET ME NOT GET ALZHEIMER'S, SWEET HEAVEN: Why many people prefer death or active deliverance to living with dementia. By Colin Brewer This book is so well written comprehensively referenced and thorough in coverage of the full range of dementia ethical and related topics that it should be required reading for anybody interested in this field particularly parliamentarians. However the book isn't just restricted to that it is a very good guide/introduction to what could be called (it goes by many names) the 'right to die movement' or the 'right to voluntary deliverance movement'. Brewer is with justification in my opinion scathing of the organised religions that frustrate efforts to bring in legislation in the UK that allows voluntary assisted dying to take place. I say this as someone who in my teenage years had a fairly comprehensive NDE and part of what I took away from that is that (a) there is definitely an afterlife and (b) that what we would refer to as a God does indeed exist. Brewer voices considerable suspicions and justified disquiet over the occupations of (so called) palliative care physicians their ruling professional body and their oft times connection to organised religion and all that entails for their patients be they in a standard NHS hospital or tucked away in some God forsaken hospice where they might find themselves subject to the tender ministrations of the true believers that practice 'medicine' in them. If we live much beyond 70 we all have a very significant chance of dying with dementia probably Alzheimers and even people in their 30s and 40s can begin the slow descent into that horribly mindless state. The need for all of us to prepare in advance for an eventuality which if it does arise cannot be resolved at a point when our mental abilities are no longer complete is well set out. The need for Advance Decisions (living wills) is clearly made and perhaps should be mandatory for all adults which would make their tasks so much easier for medical staff and reduce much of the burden for close families as well,

I concur with everything the previous two 5 star reviewers have said, One might think these end of life topics would make it a difficult read; it isn't the author's inspired writing style makes all the topics very accessible and engaging, LET ME NOT GET ALZHEIMER'S SWEET HEAVEN: Why many people prefer death or active deliverance to living with dementia: This book is quite an eye opener and also a page turner I couldn't put it down, It covers the specific subject of dementia and its effects very well: He hits them bang on target and it is very much deserved, Brewer in my knowledge (not belief; I have direct proof for myself of the validity of what I claim): However that God which I know of is in no way whatsoever anything like what the various organised religions would have people believe, I am fine with someone who is religious having their own beliefs that they would like to live and die by: Brewer I think they have absolutely no rights of any description to enforce their medieval dogmas and practices on any other group of people at all i. Brewer covers this very well in the book along with some very good historical detail and the book is well worth reading for that aspect alone: Again the book is well worth reading for this kind of 'background' detail alone: In all I'd give this book a score of 100 stars if I could. Do buy and read it in many respects it might well open your eyes, The barbarity of current practices around end of life care and dying need to end and end soon, People who are mentally competent should have free and autonomous choice over how and when they die and their own view should prevail never the opinion
