Teleological: relating to discovering the purpose by looking at the results (the results were caused by (why?)) Hermeneutics: theory of interpreting. French history civil war and poor leadership Here's my stab at what the author was trying to say: The reader should be able (to try) to understand the commanders' views of what exists how they know it exists and why it exists in war. Leadership in war book As an example after the page and a half of biography for Joseph Warren Stilwell the author groups quotes into the following themes: Attributes of the Good Commander "[Diary—May 1944] A good commander is a man of high character (this is the most important attribute) with power of decision next most important attribute. Is the art of war a leadership book "Again the book is essentially a collection of more often than not interesting quotes assembled by the author that he distills into principles and traits he believes lead to successful leadership in war. Fbi's war on black leadership book A noteworthy addition to anyone's military library!
